Hagedoorn the CIA

Hagedoorn was put on the run by Zbigniew Brzezinski, who eventually became the US National Security Advisor. Hagedoorn was a trusted advisor to the CIA director, and his departure marked the beginning of a new era in CIA operations.

The CIA's response to the Hagedoorn affair was to launch a full-scale investigation into the matter. The investigation revealed that Hagedoorn had been involved in a number of illegal activities, including corruption and espionage.

Despite the investigation, Hagedoorn continued to work for the CIA, and his influence within the agency grew. He became a key figure in the CIA's operations in the Middle East, and his influence helped to shape the agency's strategy in the region.

However, Hagedoorn's actions eventually caught up with him. In 1983, he was arrested and charged with espionage. He was eventually convicted and sentenced to 15 years in prison.

Hagedoorn's conviction was seen as a major victory for the CIA, and it marked the end of an era. The agency continued to operate under the leadership of a new director, and its focus shifted away from covert operations and towards more traditional intelligence gathering.

Today, the CIA remains one of the most powerful and influential agencies in the world. Its work continues to shape the course of international relations, and its operations continue to be shrouded in secrecy.

Draft regis

WASHINGTON AP - President Bush said Friday that his administration's draft registration program is nearing its last battle in Congress, with the administration's claims that it would not harm American men.

"We have not had the support we expected," Bush said. "We believe this is a necessary step to protect our nation."
